Market Update

Gold surges after Brexit becomes reality

June 2016

www.gold.org

With Britain voting to exit the European Union, we expect to see strong and sustained inflows into the gold market driven by the staggering level of protracted uncertainty that investors now face. The gold price surged to US$1,313.85/oz this morning, up 6% from yesterday, providing investors with a much-needed safe haven. Sterling is trading at a 31-year low and world equity markets have plummeted. The Bank of England has said that it stands ready to take whatever action is necessary, a mantra that is likely to be repeated by other central banks. In practice, this could mean interest rates move further into negative territory in parts of the world, another positive for gold. Central bank action has already capped the gain in other safe haven assets, with the Swiss National Bank intervening early this morning.

The gold price surged to US$1,313.85/oz this morning, on the AM LBMA Gold Price, up from US$1,265.75/oz the day before, and the highest level since 2014 (Chart 1). It traded as high as US$1,358.54/oz in Asian trading hours, as news of a likely Leave victory started to emerge. This has had a positive impact on gold miners, too: UK listed gold miners were up 10-20% this morning.

Gold's performance vis-a-vis other assets has been even more impressive. Sterling has fallen to a 31-year low against the dollar and world stock markets have tumbled. The FTSE100 and Euro Stoxx were down 5% and 10% respectively this morning at the time of writing (Chart 2).

It is difficult to find an event to compare this to. While trading blocs have broken down before, none have been as sizeable and important to the global economy as Europe. The UK domestic, European and world implications are profound. Nor will it be a quick process. Once Article 50 of the Treaty on the European Union has been invoked, a two-year negotiation process will begin. In the meantime, the UK's decision could trigger referendums in other European countries. We could see Scotland, in the words of Nicola Sturgeon, unequivocally vote to remain in the EU calling for another referendum. Also Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland will start emergency talks with the UK and EU to manage the border situation. Today's result could also spur populist parties in countries such as France and Germany, which have elections next year.

Gold fulfils its classic safe haven role

Gold is fulfilling its classic role as a safe haven asset and performing exactly as the many investors that bought it in the run up to the referendum will have hoped. We expect to see strong and sustained inflows into the gold market driven by the intense market uncertainty that now faces the global markets. Gold ETF holdings have also been increasing sharply, a trend we expect to see accelerate, as both retail and institutional investors re-allocate funds to gold (Chart 3). Purchases of gold coins by small retail investors, which were already up sharply in the months running up to the vote, should accelerate further.

There has already been a sharp uptick in activity on the Shanghai Gold Exchange. Trading volume spiked, reaching 346t compared to a daily average of close to 100t since the start of the year.

We could also see an increase in central bank purchases of gold. Sterling is one of the world's few reserve currencies, but has fallen to a 31-year low. Moreover, S&P Global Ratings said this morning that UK bonds could lose their AAA credit rating.

Negative interest rates to support gold demand

As well as market uncertainty, gold is supported by monetary policy actions. If central banks are forced to implement supportive measures they will likely come in the form of further extraordinary actions, new rate cuts or delays in planned hikes. Worse-than-expected US labour market data and a downgrading in economic growth forecasts in June had already seen expectations of a US Federal Reserve interest rate hike pushed out to the end of the year. Britain's departure from the European Union will likely push expectations out even further. And some central banks may push interest rates further into negative territory, increasing the investment challenges for buy and hold investors like pension funds. Indeed, today's news could see an entirely new class of gold investor emerge.

Central bank actions will also increase the attractiveness of gold vis-a-vis other safe haven assets. The Swiss National Bank has already intervened in currency markets this morning to stop the appreciation of the Swiss franc. Gold is unique in this respect: it does not carry intervention risk.

As a high quality, liquid asset, we believe gold will provide investors with a hedge against market uncertainty, economic, political and intervention risk. There are no precedents for a country leaving Europe, but other systemic risk events offer some insight into the role that gold can play in wealth preservation during extreme stress events (Chart 4). During the European sovereign debt crisis gold rose by 12% as fears of a widespread meltdown increased. Today's risks are arguably greater. There is a reason why the world's central banks hold so much of their national wealth in gold – you can see that in no uncertain terms today.
